Recent changes in state legislation have prompted educational institutions to provide remediation to students before they retake end of course standards of learning tests. This thesis tested the effectiveness of web-based instruction on common assessments. Common Assessments were modeled after the end of course World History I to 1500 A.D. Test. Web-based modules were designed using FrontPage. Objectives for WHI.2 through WHI.4 including essential knowledge and understanding were incorporated in each module and assessment. Each module was designed using constructivist, objectivist, and instructional design theories. All ninth grade students were given the opportunity in class and at home to use the World History I SOL Review Modules on the Internet. Modules were used to review material for the third quarter common assessment. Standards based common assessments were taken each quarter. Common Assessments were created by all ninth grade World History I teachers and were administered first, second, and third quarters. Common Assessments were designed using the Curriculum Framework, released test questions, and SOL Review material. Students used Scantron answer sheets for common assessments. Item analysis sheets were used to compile data by class period and teacher. Data was analyzed by class period and SOL objective. Data collected did not reflect that web-based remediation was effective on Common Assessment scores.
